The evil Skeletor (Frank Langella) is defeated by He-Man (Lundgren) but will ultimately return to infest Eternia—if not in a film sequel, then in tomorrow's cartoon.

You can't find out where He-Man went to high school, you can't scope out where he has been or how he feels or if he has any psychological complex or anything that worries him because He-Man's too much of a perfect character to do that with. The kids would get worried if I got too introspective and wonder, 'What's wrong with He-Man?' Basically, my task was to make the character alive, to make people believe from the first frame that they were watching a live character who reacts to his environment, who's angry, who gets frustrated, who cares about people and so forth.

"He-Man is a very powerful guy, but he also has a sense of humor," Lundgren continues. "He's more of an all-around character than some of the other strong heroes. Superman is a great character the way Christopher Reeve plays him, but He-Man has more of a killer instinct. He-Man's more vicious because if he gets shot, he's dead. If you're Superman, nothing can hurt you. He can eat chocolate eclairs and lie on his back all day and still win."

"Masters" Recording

In the daily Masters of the Universe TV cartoon series, the action is primarily set on the fantasy world of Eternia where the evil Skeletor rules with a bony, yet iron, fist. The Masters filmmakers, for reasons that seem primarily economic, have moved the movie's battle between good and evil mostly to Earth. "The film's excitement lies in the fast-paced action, the special effects and the contrast between Earth technology and the technology of Eternia," notes Lundgren. "Bringing the Masters of the Universe to Earth creates a contrast, not just between the technologies, but also between the way people think. He-Man's people are warriors, everybody carries a weapon. To see somebody on Earth unarmed makes He-Man think, 'Whoa, what's wrong down here?' That is definitely the hook that made the whole film, that gave the project money and made people interested."

Playing opposite Lundgren as the tyrannical Skeletor was classical actor Frank (Dracula) Langella. "It was great working with Frank Langella, he was very good. I even got to see his face once in a while in the makeup room," jokes Lundgren. "But it's fun even if you're wearing makeup, because if you have Frank's talent, so much of your performance comes through in subtle movements."

Of course, since Langella's lines were a bit muffled on the soundstage by his Skeletor mask, he had to reissue his dialogue threats in the common post-production practice known as "looping." "The re-dubbing was very important," Lundgren agrees. "My performance improved 100 percent, and so did Frank's, because the soundstage is such an artificial environment. You have the sets on live television looking like a pirate."

A pirate-like appearance would be out of character for Lundgren nowadays. The actor has traded in his metaphoric eyepatch and malevolent sneer—used to best bad guy advantage as a KGB agent in A View to a Kill and as Soviet boxer Ivan Drago in Rocky IV—for the heroic part of He-Man, champion of Eternia and leader of the Masters of the Universe. Although this is the film that officially makes him a star, the Scandinavian Lundgren maintains that He-Man was a difficult role for him to accept.

"It was a very hard decision to make because Masters is one of those films where if you didn't do it right, it would be a disaster and everyone would laugh at you for another 20 years," Lundgren comments. "I thought about it for months and months. First of all, the script turned me on. Then, the director, Gary Goddard, is one of those guys who is perfect for that genre—like George Lucas. You've got to have a certain frame of mind to deal with these matters seriously all day for a couple of years."

Like other actors who have brought heroes from other media to cinematic life, Lundgren's performance as He-Man has to compete with the audience's preconceptions. The millions of people who have grown up reading Superman comics or playing with Masters of the Universe toys may feel they know the characters better than the actors on screen do. "Frankly, I think it's an even bigger problem playing He-Man than playing Superman," Lundgren suggests, "because Superman at least lives in contemporary society. He-Man is a toy for little kids, but Superman started out in comic-book stories and then went the other way into toys.

"As an actor, when you play a character like this one, there's nothing to latch onto. There's no background research you can do.
