It is named after King's College, Cambridge, from which the college received its Royal Charter. The college originally developed in 1448, as the foundation of King's College, Cambridge by Henry VI, after whom the college is named. The college still has a high academic standing today, but has undergone several periods of decline and rise, and was rated as being the 6th best college by the 2008 United Kingdom's Times Higher Education Supplement. It was run by the College's first Master, Dr William Petre, who acquired the college's first endowed lands and scholarships. In October 1361 the Queen granted King's College the right to send its graduates to all the other Cambridge colleges, and in 1513 King's College received its Royal Charter. The College has continued to prosper, gaining more income and graduates each year, and extending the influence of its scholarships and fellowships.
